The Wise Farmstead was documented in 1998 as part of the survey of resources associated with the Civil War Battle of South Mountain, which occurred on September 14, 1862. In 1998, the Wise Farmstead was deemed significant under Criterion A of the National Register of Historic Places for its role in the Battle of South Mountain. The Wise Farmstead was at the center of the clash at Fox's Gap. The Confederates had fortified their positions along the Old Ridge Road where it intersects the Old Sharpsburg Road (Reno Monument Road). The Union forces of General McClellan advanced upon these positions up the Old Sharpsburg Road from the east. The Wise farmhouse served as a field hospital during the battle, and as a burial ground afterwards. The Confederate bodies were disinterred in 1874 from the well where they had been deposited. The Battle of South Mountain was the prelude to the Battle of Antietam three days later, on September 17, 1862. Clashes also occurred at Crampton's and Turner's Gaps.

Between 1998 and the present, there seems to have been little or no change to the site. Thus, it is still significant as a contributing resource to the South Mountain Battlefields District, under Criterion A, association with historical events. The association of Civil War personalities with the site of the Wise Farmstead is not sufficient to justify it as significant under Criterion B, association with the lives of persons in our past. There are no remaining architectural structures associated with the site, thus disqualifying it for eligibility under Criterion C. Criterion D, information potential, was not evaluated for this study.

Because of the use of the farmstead as a burial ground, in addition to the heavy fighting which occurred on the site, it is possible that future research may prove that the site is eligible under Criterion D.

This property is included in the survey of resources associated with the Civil War Battle of South Mountain, which occurred on September 14, 1862. The Wise Farmstead Site is located at the crest of Fox's Gap in the southwest corner of the intersection of Reno Monument Road and Mountain Road. None of the original buildings are standing and the ground is disturbed by the recent demolition of a later structure.

The field where the farmstead of Daniel Wise stood during the battle of South Mountain in 1862 is approximately 1 acre of open ground. It is bordered on the north by Reno Monument Road and on the east by Mountain Road. The ground shows recent disturbance caused by the removal of a later home. Sections of concrete slab are still in evidence on the surface. Several modern fruit trees and a lilac bush are also on the property, probably dating from the later structure. No evidence of the historic Wise Farmstead is apparent above ground.

The Wise property was directly involved in the course of the battle and the military action that took place. The farmstead and its surrounding fields were a focal point in the struggle for possession of the gap. The location of the Wise Farmstead in the center of Fox's Gap resulted in the presence of both Confederate and Union infantry moving across the fields and houseyard of Daniel Wise. It was also briefly the location of Bondurant's Confederate battery. Most importantly however, following the daylong battle for Fox's Gap, the farmstead was used as a hospital and burial ground.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The Wise Farm site is significant for its association with the Civil War Battle of South Mountain. The Wise property was directly involved in the course of the battle and the military action that took place on September 14, 1862. Located at the summit of South Mountain at Fox's Gap, the farmstead and its surrounding fields were a focal point in the struggle for possession of the gap. The three mountain gaps (Turner's, Fox's and Crampton's) were critical to the objectives of both the Union and Confederate armies. They were of strategic importance because they were crossing places through the mountains. Turner's Gap about a mile to the north, was the main objective for the Union army as it attempted to follow the Confederates into the Hagerstown Valley and capture the divided rebel army.

The discovery on September 13, 1862 of General Robert E. Lee's Special Order #191, the Lost Order, in a field near Frederick where the Confederates had camped precipitated the march of the Army of the Potomac toward South Mountain along the Old National Pike. The turnpike crossed the mountain running west toward the center of Lee's divided army. Had Union commander, George B. McClellan approached the mountain with speed, as he had indicated he would to President Lincoln, the Battle of South Mountain might have ended differently.¹

The Special Order #191 detailed General Lee's deployment of the Army of Northern Virginia in September 1862. In addition to the siege of Harper's Ferry by three divisions under Stonewall Jackson from the west and two divisions under Lafayette McLaws from the northeast, the orders described the location of Robert E. Lee and James Longstreet with two divisions at Hagerstown and D.H.Hill's division, alone at Boonsboro, just below Turner's Gap. With the knowledge of the divided nature of Lee's army on the west side of South Mountain, and the small defensive line at the pass, McClellan felt confident in his army's ability to catch Lee's forces in this vulnerable position. However, McClellan's infamous cautiousness and over-estimation of the size of his opponent, delayed the movement of the Army of the Potomac for half a day. The result of his slow approach to the pass at South Mountain was to give the Confederate defenders time to reinforce their tenuous position and begin pulling their divided army together again at Sharpsburg.

General Alfred Pleasonton's Cavalry were the first Union troops to approach South Mountain by the Old National Pike on September 13, 1862. Jacob D. Cox's Kanawha Division was in Middletown to serve as support for the cavalry.² Brigadier General Cox reported, "At 6 o'clock in the morning of September 14 the division marched from Middletown under an order...from Major-General Reno, directing me to support...the advance of General Pleasanton, who, with his brigade of cavalry and artillery, was moving up the Hagerstown turnpike toward the positions of the enemy in the pass of South Mountain."³ Here the famous warning "My God, be careful" from Colonel Moore, who had been paroled by the Confederates, convinced Cox that a greater force was on the mountain than the Lost Orders had led them to believe, a result of McClellan's delay.⁴ Thus began the Federals' plan to flank the defenders on the left and right by the convenient Sharpsburg and Hagerstown Roads leading from the National Pike at Bolivar. General Cox continued, "...I rode forward to find Pleasanton, who was...where the old Sharpsburg road leaves the turnpike. I found that he was convinced that the enemy's position in the gap was too strong to be carried by a direct attack, and that he had determined to let his horsemen demonstrate on the main road, supporting the batteries... while Scammon should march by the Sharpsburg road and try to reach the flank of the force on the summit."⁵ Later in the day, Hooker's I Corps would be sent by General McClellan down the Old Hagerstown Road (Mt. Tabor and Frostown Roads) to flank the left side of the Confederate defense. (Murfin, p.178) D.H.Hill's response to the deployment of the Union troops as he viewed them from his headquarters at the Mountain House on the crest of the pass, would set up the battles at Fox's and Turner's Gaps. Major General Hill stated, "Should the truth be known, the battle of South Mountain, as far as my division was concerned, will be regarded as one of the most remarkable and creditable of the war....the division numbered less than 5,000 men the morning of September 14, and we had five roads to guard, extending over a space of as many miles."⁶

The Kanawha Division, IX Corps of the Army of the Potomac, under the command of Brigadier General Jacob D. Cox were given the task of turning the right flank of General D.H. Hill at Fox's Gap.⁷ Scammon's Brigade found the Sharpsburg Road well defended by Bondurant's batteries, and were forced to the left again along the "loop" farm lane. In the fields to the left of the Sharpsburg Road, just below the crest of the mountain, much of the morning battle raged.⁸

The afternoon of September 14th, following a lull in the battle for Fox's Gap, both forces' reinforcements began to appear. Up the Sharpsburg Road came Brigadier General Orlando B. Willcox's First Division in support of Cox's Kanawha Division. "I was ordered by General Burnside to ...march up by the Sharpsburg road, and take up a position near Cox...I planted a section of Cook's battery near the turn of the road, and opened fire on enemys battery across the main pike. After a few good shots, the enemy unmasked a battery on his left, over Shriver's [Fox's] Gap, from a small field enveloped by woods."⁹ Following this attack came a charge by Hood's Confederate brigade. In the words of Colonel Benjamin C. Christ, USA: "I therefore led forward the 17th Michigan on the right of the road while Colonel Welsh advanced on the left with 45th Pennsylvania and 46th New York...then opened fire on the enemy with terrible effect, piling the road and field with his dead and wounded..."¹⁰ The Confederate forces had been pushed north and west from Fox's Gap but Turner's Gap had not yet fallen.

Wise's fields and cabin figure prominently in any discussion of the September 14, 1862 battle at Fox's Gap on South Mountain. Located directly at the crest of the gap at the intersection of the old Sharpsburg Rd. and the Ridge Rd., the farmstead of Daniel Wise is perhaps best known for its' well where reportedly 58 Confederate corpses were dumped.¹¹

The location of the Wise Farmstead in the center of Fox's Gap resulted in the presence of both Confederate and Union infantry moving across the fields and houseyard of Daniel Wise. It was also briefly the location of Bondurant's Confederate battery.¹² Most importantly however, following the daylong battle for Fox's Gap, the farmstead was used as a hospital and burial ground.¹³

While the cabin of Daniel Wise is no longer standing, the potential for the Wise Farmstead as an archeological site is substantial. The number of Union and Confederate soldiers buried in the area of Wise's cabin was nearly 200.¹⁴ The bodies were buried in long trenches, Capt. James Wren wrote in his diary entry of September 15, 1862: "...in a field to the left of this house was a long line of dead soldiers laying side by side..."¹⁵ The famous burial in Wise's well is described by Samuel Compton, 12th Ohio: "...Then staggering as [the] very drunk will, they dragged the corpses to a 60 foot well and tumbled them in."¹⁶ Stottemyer notes further proof of the men buried in the well from the 1869 list of burial place of Confederate soldiers, now called "Bowie's List", the entry reads: "58 unknown, In Wise's well on South Mountain."¹⁷

In 1874 Henry C. Mumma was paid to reinter the Confederate dead listed in "Bowie's List", including those on South Mountain. However, Stottemyer notes that remains have been found on battlefields such as Antietam, as recently as 1989, since the 1874 reinterment, and the possibility of more undiscovered remains still exists today.¹⁸ Archaeologically the possibility of human remains is there, however they would undoubtedly be disturbed. The infamous well, while presumably emptied of the bodies in 1874, is probably still intact below the plowzone.

The Wise Farm was a subsistence hill farm on the summit of South Mountain. The house was a small two bay wide log building which should be characterized as a cabin. It is recorded in Civil War era photographs and on Army Engineers' maps from the war. Deed research has revealed no recorded deeds prior to the transaction from Matilda Wise to Mary E. Albright on June 6, 1885 (Washington County Deed Liber 92, folio 549).

Sharpsburg

As farmer David Miller walked through his 30 acre corn field near Sharpsburg in early September, he probably anticipated the harvest of a good corn crop. How could he have known that four hours of battle in his cornfield on the morning of the 17th would result in thousands of killed, wounded, and missing men?(1) How could he have known that future generations would remember his cornfield as part of "America's bloodiest square mile."? Would he have believed that artillery and rifle fire would cut the corn "as closely as could have been done with a knife."? Would he have found it conceivable that in the following days there would be at least four thousand dead to bury? And like farmer Wise, he would also have to give up his house for a hospital.

How many of the local population surmised that the old sunken lane they used as a shortcut from the Hagerstown Pike to the Boonsboro Pike would be the scene of so much carnage that it would forever after be known simply as Bloody Lane?

The Burial Detail

At some point in his military service, the average soldier could expect to find himself on burial detail. It was not always the shirker, drunkard, or straggler assigned to this duty. The good soldier could end up on burial detail by being in the wrong place at the wrong time. These details were usually impromptu affairs and their creation usually depended on the type of battle that had transpired. Civil War burials often depended on the side which found itself in possession of the field after the battle.
